

This is Canada's first nuclear power plant, known as NPD (Nuclear Power Demonstration). It is located on the shores of the Ottawa River, about 150 miles west northwest of Ottawa and 12 miles upstream from the Chalk River research centre of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. AECL, Ontario Hydro and Canadian General Electric Company Limited co-operated in the planning and construction. NPD is a prototype for larger plants, such as the 200,000-kilowatt Douglas Point Nuclear Power Station now being built on the eastern shore of Lake Huron, midway between Port Elgin and Kincardine, Ontario.

These fuel bundles are being packaged for shipment to the Nuclear Power Demonstration Station, which is located on the Ottawa River near Rolphton, Ontario. Made at the Peterborough works of Canadian General Electric Company Limited, each bundle is about 20 inches long and contains some 33 pounds of uranium dioxide.

When loaded, the NPD reactor contains about 30 tons of uranium dioxide made up of 1188 bundles, each of which is some 20 inches long and contains close to 33 pounds of the fuel. Shown in this picture are packaged fuel bundles at the Nuclear Power Demonstration Station before being loaded into the reactor.

This is one of the two fuelling machines at the Nuclear Power Demonstration Station where it is shown receiving the final check prior to the reactor going into operation. These machines are used to put new fuel bundles into the reactor and to remove used ones. At the right are the ends of the pressure tubes which contain the uranium fuel bundles.
