THE TOYOTA CROWN
FEELS BRAND NEW FOR THE FIRST 15,000 MILES

It took about six months for some Toyota dealers to learn that they shouldn't demonstrate a brand new Toyota Crown. The plain truth is that a Toyota Crown is just too stiff when it's new. It needs about 15,000 miles on the clock before it gives its true performance.
Toyota are stiff when they're new because that's a part of Toyota's tradition of building cars to last longer than other cars. Japanese people don't have as much money as Canadians so they have to keep their cars about ten years. And they keep them in a country which has some of the worst roads in the world as well as some of the finest super highways. The cars have to be strong and rugged and reliable or nobody will buy them.
The first thousand miles in a Toyota won't thrill the average new car buyer. But drive a Toyota Crown with 15,000 miles on the clock, or 50,000 or 100,000 miles and it's a different kind of car. The solid 18 gauge steel body (4 s.w.g. heavier than standard automotive sheet metal) is silent up to 80 on the highway and the soft, controlled suspension absorbs any kind of bump without creaks, groans or rattles. The Toyota is the only car in its class with a massive X-braced, box section frame combined with a one piece body. The whole thing is so strong and safe that a Toyota rally car was rolled onto its side in last year's CNE rally and yet there was only one minor dent in a rear fender. All doors opened easily and no glass was broken. Total repairs were $30.00.
When you go to your CMI dealer's, see if you can take a demonstration in a Crown with more than 15,000 miles behind it. Then buy a new one and put up with a "tight" car for the first few thousand miles. When the car has done 50,000 miles you'll be glad you did.
