Angry Critics Stilled

NEW YORK (AP)—James H. Meredith's sudden decision to pull out of the congressional race against Adam Clayton Powell has stilled the angry criticism generated in New York's Harlem district by his candidacy.

Former critics were free with their praise for the 33-year-old maverick civil rights activist who decided not to run as a Republican less than 24 hours after saying the race was as important to him as a presidential nomination.

But Meredith's generally cryptic statements have made the decision a subject for extensive speculation and there is a growing feeling in Harlem that he may have been a victim of bad advice.

LACKS NEGRO SUPPORT

Almost from his announcement of candidacy last Tuesday, a revolt was evident among Harlem Republicans, none of whom had a good word for his candidacy.

Meredith said first at an impromptu press conference Monday that he changed his mind because the Republicans had not delivered on promises of money to help finance his campaign and other assistance.

Later in the day, at a second formal press conference, Meredith appeared vague on why he had pulled out. He denied it was because of pressures brought Sunday by Floyd McKissick, national director of the Congress of the NAACP. They told Meredith he would be dead politically if he insisted on opposing Powell.

Evers said he and Meredith clasped hands and wept when they parted sometime after 1 a.m. Meredith made his announcement shortly after 1 a.m.

With Vincent Albano Jr., chairman of the New York County Republica committee, at his side, Meredith did not repeat his accusations at the formal press conference that the Republican party reneged on promises of money and campaign help.

NO REASON TO QUIT?

Asked why, in view of the election's importance, he withdrew, he said he thought his press secretary, C. Robert Holt, "answered that best when he said, 'we may never fully know.'"

Asked if he had been threatened, he angrily replied: "It's a good thing no one ever threatened me."

Belt, who is one of Meredith's close friends, hinted that the man who braved a riot to desegregate the University of Mississippi, and then was shot on a march through Mississippi, may have been stunned by the amount of emotionalism in the sentiment for Powell.
