Study of Georgetown May Become a Book

Uusing Georgetown as an example of what happens when a town gets "growing pains" a University of Toronto professor has been making an extensive study of Heatner Court, Hyland Rd. the town's history this sum-

> When he has tabulated his results, they will form the nucleus of a thesis he is writing for his doctorate of philosophy. And if his final ambitions materialize, Georgetown will be featured someday in a book.

There is one important fact, however. Nowhere will the name of the town or of any of his informants be used, for a portion of the material is highly confidential.

Actually the survey has been going on for almost two years. Alan Powell, who leetures in the university's sociology department, has had members of his class make field trips to town to gain pertinent data. This summer he moved to town, and has been at the job full time.

An assistant, Miss Carol Winter, spent many days checking back files of The Herald, choosing significant points in Georgetown's conversion from a small town of 2500, to over four times that

Lately, people involved in the town's civic and business life have been interviewed. Now a random telephone survey of residents is in pro-

When the project ends over 600 people will have been interviewed, Mr. Powell

An initial report was made last year when he delivered a paper on "Local government in small town Ontario" to the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs. Mr. Powell still blushes when he recalls that in the midst of his talk, he inadvertently started to say "Georgetown" and this was quoted in the Toronto press.

Why was Georgetown chosen?

Because of its handy preximity to the city, but mainly because it is a perfect example of a growing town, close enough to the city to feel its effects, and far enough away to still retain its entity as a community.

In Canada six years. " Mr. Powell is a London Welshman, educated at Leicester and London universities, and with an M.A. from the University of Alberta in Edmonton. He describes himself as an urban sociologist, interested in such things as community planning.

One side effect of his visits to Georgelown - ne has fallen in love with the town, and is considering making it his permanent home, He will be teaching this year at the new Erindale College,
