New hunter control plan success

The angry plea to have stricter controls imposed on hunting voiced by Nassagaweya Reeve Mrs. A. MacArthur is not consistent with the feelings of township ratepayers, according to Conservation Officer Dale Gartley.

"We've had two complaints but most of the people are happy. When they compare the service we offer under our land management program to what they have under the township by-law, they recognize the benefit of our program," Gartley says.

Around the clock
"We have men working seven days a week, 24 hours a day in the field and check from the air as well," the Lands and Forests representative told this paper. At a recent meeting of council Mrs. MacArthur indicated the township should change their by-law to permit only landowners to hunt on their own land.

A program introduced into Nassagaweya this year provides an opportunity for landowners to sign an agreement with the Department of Lands and Forests. Under the program landowners allow hunters to hunt in one portion of their property while the Department signs off another portion of the property as a restricted zone.

Good program
The Department and the Halton Sportsmen's Association believe the program is a good one because it provides a place for hunters to hunt and allows the department to control the hunting in restricted zones.

One of the advantages of the program is stricter penalties for violations. Neither the OPP or Detachment of Lands and Forests will enforce the fish and game act and the OPP will act on the petty trespass act. The petty trespass act carries a nominal fine while a violation under the fish and game act could mean the loss of a valuable gun, on top of a fine.

Gartley noted there were no more hunters than other years. He said only 200 licences were issued by the township. "We encourage a landowner—hunter relationship," he said.

To date 20 persons in the township have entered into the program and an increasing number are showing interest. A total of 5,500 acres are involved and of that 5,500, approximately RECENT IMPROVEMENTS at the corner of Mill and Park streets have given the corner a bright new appearance. 2,500 are available for hunting. The rest is reserved under the safety or restricted zone. Gartley noted the program has exceeded what the Department had anticipated already.

Officers lay charge
One of the big advantages of the system is the landowner doesn't have to appear in court or get personally involved with the charges that are laid. Conservation officers lay the charges. Gartley encourages landowners to report violations of the agreement to the Department. "Often we have a car right in the area and we have one in the district all the time," he noted.

The Lands and Forest and Sportsmen spokesmen feel there are few problems and often those problems are unduly attributed to the hunters. However, Reeve MacArthur has taken a dim look at the situation and feels a need for greater controls on the hunters. The reeve has received at least two written complaints and one verbal complaint about damage done by hunters.

Blocks change
Reeve MacArthur attempted to block the Department from introducing the program when they appeared at council. She convinced council not to change the by-law. However after seeking legal opinion, Department officials learned a change in the by-law wasn't necessary.

Gartley claims people in Nassagaweya are interested in wildlife and conservation and once conservation officers have an opportunity to discuss the program with landowners, many go along with the program even if they don't hunt themselves.
