When talking about cals and kitters, some folks seem to have the idea that cats are fairly placed uninteresting animals who eat in their given corner, sleep in a chosen chair, and have their kittens in a provided box.

How wrong they are! True, cats will generally eat where they're fed,-unless, that is, they drag in a mouse (not necessarily dead.) That must be eaten, of course, under a bed in the dead of night with great munchings and crunchings.

back as well as the seat. And curled up or stretched out, but in impossibly balanced positions as well. Like with the rear end nicely positioned on the chair's arm, with all the rest hanging upside down space, the furnace crawl over the edge.

Other than chairs and beds, there's all the other furniture to lie on-planos, tea wagons. desks, tables, etc. Or in bookcases, drawers, china cabinets, cupboards and so on. And then there's the places like the dryer, wastepaper baskets, bowls, record racks or bathtubs. I guess youcould say that if it's physically possible, a cat will try if it's impossible, too.

When it comes to having grass. kittens, that box bit is usually Then, the other day, Gord just a big laugh. I figure that in the 14 years we've lived in the country, there have been around 60 litters born. Very rarely would the cats walk in the house, climb into their box, and have the family peaceable.

Neither our first cat, Mama-cat, or I had had kittens before, and neither of us knew what to expect from the Mama-cat refused to stay put in her box, and followed me around meowing plaintively. She finally agreed to stop and have her kittens in the empty baby crib if I sat beside her and rubbed her
