

Some things have changed in the 99 years at The Acton Free Press

- from handset type, to the installation of Halton's first Linotype and now to modern photo typesetting computers
- from tedious hand fed presses to giant automatics
- from three Mill St. locations, through three additions at one building and now to a completely new location and larger building
- from a one newspaper operation to the publication of three Halton newspapers
- from a staff of three to nearly 100 full and part time people.

but some things haven't changed

Then as now it takes a crew of dedicated, committed people to staff the newspaper and now the publishing company. It has taken people that care when it comes to the extra effort it takes to win national awards or start up a new press.

At The Free Press we value those who pioneered the publication as well as the town. It took dedication and vision for both.

We salute too, those who continue to take pride at The Free Press, pride in the publication and pride in the community it serves. Pride too in service to other publications that flow now from a diversified plant that calls Acton its home.

Happy Centennial from all of us at
