Wants to save farm land

Regional planners and Regional Council will have to look more carefully at zoning of land, if agricultural land in Halton Region is going to be preserved, according to Halton Regional Chairman Allan Masson.

Mr. Masson made that statement during a press conference Thursday. He explained that many municipalities have zoned lands agriculture when there was no definite designation for the land. As a result, the agriculture zone became known as a holding zone.

into consideration the availability of sewage and water services.

The question of appealing severances granted by the land division committee has been a continuing controversy at the regional planning committee level. Generally representatives from the southern municipalities are more apt to stick to the letter of the law and enforce strict planning
