Introducing the burner with a mind of its own.

Lormorty Sprints & Last

The burner-with-a-brain.

It's one of the features in natural gas ranges. And one of the features you should seriously consider when you're thinking of replacing your present gas range.

Quite simply, the burner-with-abrain thermostatically maintains a preset temperature. It turns the gas on or off, depending on your setting (just like the thermostat in your house). So you're never using more energy than is needed for the job.

What that means is that you can leave a stew simmering all day, knowing it's doing just that. Simmering. You can pop popcorn without shaking the pot, melt chocolate directly over the flame, or keep coffee just below perking.

Now that's sensible. But then, so are its other features. For one, natural gas is efficient. There's no refining or generating involved, so you're getting fuel energy right from its source. And that's a wise and efficient use of energy.

And gas ranges come with the most contemporary features. You'll find them with continuous cleaning ovens, self-timing ovens, and micro-ray broilers, and all the latest styles, with colours to match your decor. But talking won't convince you. You have to see them yourself. Because we know you have a mind of your own.
