Anne to, Monday My last jottings were from a high clift on Man and there's so much I've seen since then that it seems to be more than a ten days ago.

For to flow out much may look that and straight on a man, they are imbeherably turbly coursel neroes the moors) and ow hear out allet different went up was marked as a 1.7 incline.

June 15. Well I didn't get much done that day either It was written on a sandy beach on the island of Lewis, and was atundoped while I took a quick every quicks dip in the occup Then, with a marvellous hot sun shining, the day was too nice to sit and write

So much ground has been covered since that cliff on Skye, sincluding a 1.5 incline: I drove through the Quiraine Hills and visited Duntulm Castle ruins that day, then took the ferry across to Lochmaddy getting quite seasick on fairly rough water) on Uist, and moved on to Tarbert on Harris for the next night.

Friendly seal

A swing to the south brought me around to a beach fantastic Scarastavore There was well over 100 acres of beautiful sand and nobody there but me and a seal who kept surfacing a small way out in the ocean for a look at me

I was hoping he'd come in to shore, but he moved off up the coast. However, two ducks went marching past with two young off-spring trotting in between.

It was on in the afternoon when I reached Stornoway on the island of Lewis and when I found my "Bed and Breakfast" house on Goathill Crescent, was quickly rushed into a walled garden and steered into a chair.

It seems that on a Sunday. people are supposed to keep their children, dogs, laundry. and selves inside. However, Mrs. Jones said, the sun stanes so seldom that she didn't have the heart to coop up the family that day.

Sightseelng

The weather was so beautiful. I spent two days in Stornoway, and saw many of the old, old stones, houses, churches and such, some dating so far back it's hard to believe. The Callanish standing stones are at least 3,500 years old, and the Broch tower at Dun Carloway is from the Iron Age.

I'm not that interested in history or architecture, but the building of these things was a fantastic feat of engineering.

Tuesday took me to Ullapool, back on the mainland, and a conversation there made me realize how futile it was to try and describe Scotland.

Somebody asked me to compare it and Canada. I couldn't. They're totally different. And the Scottish country and scenery can vary so much just by driving 100 miles in any direction for even no) that I could write on and on without getting much

Let's just say it is inerdibly levely it's ricks. trees, moors, rivers, and everything. There hasn't been a road I've driven on that hasn't sprung some supprise on me that made me grab for the camera, from two highland stags to an old kilted Scotsman rooming the moors, to a ewe and lamb skeping against a "l'ark here" sign.

Half the time I didn't know where I was chave been lost a good third of the time) and saw some of the most beautiful farms with hige stone outbuildings (which, I'm told, are called "steadings") while on those back roads.

I've seen many of the ruins on the mainland I'd hoped to see by a lot of heavy driving one day on the way from Ullapool to Aberdeen via Inverness and Cruden Bay. The Highland games were magnificent, very colorful and exciting. I'm glad I made it in time. But wouldn't you know I was looking the other way when an Australian took the world caber tossing championship from a Scot.

And guess who's umbrella it was got caught in the wind and took off across the hammer throwing championships.

Right now I'm in the dilemma I was shving away from right from the first that of being stuck (whether with relatives or otherwise) when I wanted to move.

However, it can't be helped. A man from the Criminal Investigation Department is busy fingerprinting my car and I've been asked not to

Within hours after I arrived in Aberdeen (parking the car under a street lamp where It would be safe) vandals took their ruddy big feet to it and mashed up the one side quite

Police found the damage and caught the stupid clods within the hour after it happened, but I have to wait for all the proper investigation and reports to be done.

What was so (mistrating, was to try to follow Avis' instructions regarding damage to a rented car. The folder says to phone the nearest office and fill out a report form.

I phoned Avis at Dyc airport where 1 got very vague instructions to just get a report from the police and hand it in at Prestwick when I

However, the police assure No two me there is no way they can

I finally talked one of the constables who came to the house for information into jotting down the name and number of the one who discovered the damage. Hopefully I can leave tomorrow afternoon

The halls of the Acton high school look pretty sparse save for the janitors and con-struction workers. However, the office, much to the amazement of some, is full of hustle, and bustle. It is a regular beehive of activity. The secretaries are busy all summer with cataloguing incoming textbooks, filling out forms and hundreds of other jobs that continue on a day-to-day basis.

Nothing annoys these women more than someone asking "What is it like having the summer off?" They wouldn't know, according to one anonymous secretary. They get two weeks of holidays just like almost every other member on the working force of North America.

So next time you feel like asking a high school secretary that inevitable, but despised question, bite your
