

Nurses closer to arbitration since strike

Halton Public Health Nurses feel they accomplished much with their recent one week strike but their employers, Halton Region, figure all they did was lose two weeks' pay.

The nurses went out on strike on June 14 and stayed away until June 21. When they returned they found the region had decided to lock them out and keep them off the job until June 28 in retaliation for the strike.

"We did an awful lot of public relations that week we were on strike. There are many more people aware of what we do now than before and we strengthened our bonds of unity across the province," Pat Harrison, Local One, Halton, Ontario Nurses' Association said in an interview this week.

She assessed the strike as being of great value since

"we were able to get the point across that we don't want to strike, we want compulsory arbitration so the public need never be denied our services again."

Mrs. Harrison admitted that even though over 1,000 public health nurses went out on strike across Ontario in the hopes of forcing Queen's Park to come up with compulsory arbitration there hasn't been any indication the province is planning any changes to accommodate the nurses' demands.

"It was a most unfortunate development. Neither party gained anything and there was just no rational reason for the strike. Of course there was no rational reason for the lock-out either," region director of personnel Dennis Camm said.

Mrs. Harrison noted Halton and many other boards of health have now moved to mediation. She interprets this as something of a victory since it brings the nurses a step closer to arbitration.

On the other hand, Camm says mediation is simply the next step towards reaching an agreement.

"Mediation is the normal route to follow when there has been a complete breakdown in negotiations and a work stoppage so it can't be viewed as a victory by the nurses."

CONSTRUCTION OF A new pump house in Prospect Park, near the lake, is expected to be finished this week, says Alex Muselius of Sunny Construction. Gary Burtch, right, watches as the backhoe with Max Muselius at the controls breaks the earth Thursday. A concrete block house will replace the frame shed which was once the Acton Women's Institute booth.
