

Woman collapses in street — district nurse saves life

Skill in cardio-pulmonary resuscitation (CPR), enabled a local nurse to save the life of a woman who collapsed on a Toronto street recently.

Mrs. Morrey of R.R. 2, Rockwood thinks wives and people who work in public places such as shopping plazas should learn the techniques of CPR.

Mrs. Morrey and a nurse friend, Lois Hamilton, were driving when they noticed the woman fall to the ground. They stopped the car and ran to her. Having quickly determined the elderly woman's heart had stopped (cardiac arrest), they began mouth-to-mouth resuscitation and external cardiac massage, the two components of CPR. "It was an automatic reaction," Mrs. Morrey said in recalling the event.

When the ambulance arrived the pair accompanied the woman to hospital, continuing the resuscitation measures.

After treatment in the emergency department, the woman was transferred to the hospital's coronary care unit, where the two nurses visited her the next day. "She was sitting up, talking and joking," Mrs. Morrey said. "She was fortunate someone going by knew what to do," Mrs. Morrey commented. The first hour after a heart attack is the most important, she said. In the case of a cardiac arrest, resuscitation must be started within four minutes. After that time, there is danger of brain damage.

Because of this crucial time element, Mrs. Morrey said it would be helpful if lay people were trained in CPR. "It must be frustrating if someone you know and love has suffered an arrest and there's nothing you can do."

According to Mrs. Morrey, Seattle, which has a high incidence of heart attacks and arrests among young executives, has initiated programs to teach executives' wives CPR techniques. (Because of their hormonal make-up, young women are less prone to heart trouble, she said.) Courses apparently are available in Toronto as well.

An untrained person should not attempt CPR, Mrs. Morrey warned. Even when the correct procedure is followed, the victim's ribs are sometimes broken. However, if the victim is successfully revived, he is not so concerned about broken ribs, she said.

A person is judged to have suffered a cardiac arrest when heartbeat is absent, breathing has stopped, color is poor and pupils are dilated, Mrs. Morrey explained. The purpose of CPR is to restart the circulation of blood and oxygen to vital tissues.

Mouth-to-mouth resuscitation alone is inadequate in the case of a cardiac arrest because there is no circulation to carry the oxygen where it is needed.

Nevertheless, a person trained in mouth-to-mouth resuscitation should use the measure on a suspected heart victim who isn't breathing in the chance his heart is still beating, Mrs. Morrey said. If a victim of collapse complains of chest, neck and arm pain, by-standers should leave him where he is, the nurse said. "To avoid putting strain on the heart make the victim comfortable where he is, loosen tight clothing and discourage him from moving."

"If he is conscious, try to prop him up a little. If he is unconscious, lie him on his side so he doesn't aspirate, and remove dentures or vomit to make sure the airway is clear," she said.

Mrs. Morrey cautioned that sometimes a person who is choking can be mistaken for a heart attack victim. Emergency measures are different in this case.

Mrs. Morrey received several letters of thanks and praise for her life-saving efforts. "For me the letters are secondary," she said. "The greatest feeling was to see her happy and well after seeing her so ill."

A staff nurse in the emergency department of the Toronto East General Hospital Mrs. Morrey found the incident a different and challenging experience.

PUBLIC HEALTH nurse Shirley McKay hasn't been making her usual rounds lately and here's why—six-week-old Kirsten. She will be returning to work after her maternity leave.
