Enthusiastic friends and interested individuals prompted Mr. Lister and Neil Walsom, the second half of the mastership, to organize a local hunt club.

"But more than anything, it is a family club, with members and their children hunting together," said Mr. Lister, noting that few clubs encourage a family oriented club organization.

While the club adheres to the traditions of fox hunting, including proper attire and hunting etiquette, "It is much more of a social thing," explained Mr. Lister.

Improved horsemanship is certainly stressed, but the group also has the opportunity to get out and enjoy the scenery and the company of other individuals, he continued.

Following the style of a regular hunt day, the president of the club, Gunnar Lindvek addresses the group and wishes them a successful hunt. "The sport is chasing and not killing," stresses Mr. pack of hounds has yet to capture a fox, since they began the club.

While the number of hounds in the club's pack is insufficient to consider the hounds as a working pack, the masters insist on working the hounds and refuse to lay a "drag scent"-traditionally done when there are less than 12 couples of hounds.

"We much prefer to have the hounds working, sniffing, than to have them tear down a field after a scent has been laid on the ground."

A working pack also allows the riders to enjoy the ride
