Board asked to reduce professional days

For the second time this year Halton Board of Education will be asked to reduce its teachers professional activity days.

Thursday, following review by trustees of an administration report on professional activity days, Oakville member Jim Clelland announced he will ask the board to trim the number of professional activity days from nine to seven at the September 28 board meeting. Clelland's proposed cut would take effect this year.

In presenting his report Superintendent of Instruction John Bolch noted there was just no way to do a cost-benefit study on professional activity days as the board asked.

He observed over $2 million in wages are spent paying the teachers for those nine days but elimination of the professional activity days wouldn't save any money since the teachers would then be in class teaching and still getting paid.

Bolch said he and his colleagues in the senior administration still believe the board gets good value for professional activity days but there is no way to prove it.

A survey of principals showed teachers spend a lot of time doing administration work on professional activity days, especially high school teachers, a little time on curriculum and even less time on professional development.

Trustee Fred Armitage complained the report didn't deal enough with the tremendous cost to the board for professional activity days and observed the public will support these days children aren't in class only if they are helping teachers improve in the classroom. He said he was sure new administration methods could be found so teachers aren't doing administrative chores on professional activity days.

The public and the board need to know if professional activity days are as valuable educationally as days when students are in school since so much is spent on wages for those nine days.

Pointing out over half of Halton's public school teachers are in the highest pay bracket because of their experience and qualifications Clelland wondered why they were out of the class any days and needing any professional development?

Bolch noted there are more school days in Ontario than in other provinces and states so the nine days weren't really lost from teaching children and make the teachers better.

He said the same as other highly qualified professionals in industry, teachers need professional development time to learn new methods and skills.

To give teachers time for classroom administrative duties is no reason to cancel classes veteran Oakville Trustee Judy Alexander declared. She said professional activity days are supposed to afford elementary and secondary school teachers the chance to get together and move closer towards integration of the two panels.

Trustee Elaine Rhlem noted elementary teachers work about 5.7 hours and secondary school teachers about 6.4 hours on professional activity days and wondered why when a report tabled earlier this year said teachers are working an average of 8.1 hours a day. She suggested if teachers worked from 9 a.m. until 5 p.m. on professional activity days then they would have more time for professional development.

"I still don't see how students can benefit from having 5 per cent less instruction per year," Trustee Noel Cooper declared.

He said consultants and coordinators should be doing professional development with teachers during lunch hours and after classes.

Bolch said the administration assumes in-service training and professional development improve performance in the classroom but can't prove it with facts and figures.

Superintendent of Program Bruce Mather noted the board's core curriculum weighs 93 pounds and going over that takes time with the teachers so professional activity days are needed.

Professional activity days are an "annoying and concerning" issue Trustee Bill Herd declared adding there is an obvious lack of professional development on those nine days so where is the benefit to students?

Clelland concluded the number of professional activity days should be cut to seven this school year and the emphasis on those days should be on professional development with administration being done at other times.
