

Much interest in university courses

The University of Waterloo reports considerable public interest in a survey into the feasibility of offering university courses next fall in the Halton Hills region.

According to Stephen A. Jones, external affairs office, Faculty of Arts, 250 questionnaires have been completed.

"We hope to offer courses by September," he says.

If offered, the courses could be attended for degree credit (you pay a fee and get a credit towards a university degree if you successfully complete a course) or simply a series of free public lectures. Fees are waived in any event for persons over 60.

A typical arrangement is for a course to meet once a week, in the evening, for approximately two-and-a-half to three hours. Jones thinks the most likely arrangement would be to offer courses from September through to mid-December; then pass over the "winter" period because of possible weather problems and run from March to mid-June. Successful completion of a three-and-a-half month course would result in one-half credit towards a degree.

Further details are available from the libraries which have been co-operating with UW in the survey: Georgetown (877-2681) and Acton (853-0301).
