mar Tiesenhansen, Joe MacKern, Alfred Newman, Doug Jordan, Bucket, (no other name given), and Gord Chafe.

Bikers break out of mould

Today's society is quick to stereotype various professions and hobbies. Librarians are thought to be quiet, mousey looking bespectacled maidens. Undertakers are pictured as tall, ghoulish looking characters right out of an Alfred Hitchcock movie. However, in Acton, the moulds are broken and our stereotypes are individuals, with no resemblance to people's expectations of them.

Another group in Acton is striving to break the mould too—that of rowdy motorcycle gangs.

They have no name, no leader. They are just a group of friends who own motorcycles. There are no black leather jackets with intimidating words on the back, and chains hanging from their pockets.

The friends all own North American made cycles, and most of them also own cars for the winter. They are mainly in industry and almost all of them have a skilled trade.

The group varies in size from 25 to 30. They come and go as do their interests and they have no meetings, future plans, etc. When not working, they spend their time tinkering with their machines, or polishing the chrome.

"We are just a bunch of fun-loving guys who don't want any trouble with anybody," one member of the group says. "We'll help you out when you are in trouble," he continued.

To destroy the mean biker myth is the goal of this group, which even has a 50 year old member.
