A Publishing Legend — Alive and Well

Just what is a thriving bookshop and rapidly-growing publishing business doing nestled in this sparsely-populated section of Northeastern Ontario?

Very well, thank you. And to . elaborate, Highway Bookshop proprietor, Doug Pollard, will tell you that the bookshop has "well over 100,000 books" in stock, as well as a special section of books published right at the bookshop.

These facts will be even more impressive when one realizes Just how the Highway Bookshop af Cobalt came into being. Doug Pollard was born and raised in Northern Ontario, and except for a brief period working in Montreal and Toronto, has spent most of his life here.

The story, which has become a legend in this neck of the woods goes like this: In 1957, Doug purchased printing equipment from a defunct weekly newspaper and began taking orders for job printing. He kept a basket of pocket books at the shop to keep his customers occupied while they waited for their orders to be filled.

Eventually, some of the customers began trading their pocket books with the stock Doug kept. This soon blossomed and It wasn't long before people were travelling long distances to trade books with Doug.

. When the business began to mushroom, Doug built the present main building to house the hundreds of books arriving dally. He was in an ideal location for expansion, as he owned 40 acres of land a stone's throw from busy Highway 11 bypass. Cobalt is four miles southeast.

in time, he began stocking new books, also.

Commenting on the booktrading business, Doug said, "there are still loads of people coming in to trade books these days but the majority of business is done with paperbacks rather than hardcovers.".

Now as a publisher of many books, he gives proference to Northern Ontario authors and most of the books published to date are writers from this area.

But—the Highway Bookshop is still a grand place to browse away a rainy afternoon!
