Drownings...

MacColl watched as another swimmer attempted to pull the first one to safety, but was pulled under. As he threw the rope out to him, the second man was able to grab the endangered swimmer from behind and pulled him to shore.

Both men walked down Mill Street to get back to the beach, rather than swim across the lake again.

"There's going to be more drownings," predicted MacColl, who has watched the beach for many years.

He has a theory of what is happening under the water, but does not want to be quoted. But, he said, the beach should be closed down permanently.

MacColl remembered years ago when one youngster drowned with his mother watching on the shore not 20 feet away. He just stepped in a big hole and disappeared.

"It's dangerous out there alright."

Neither Mayor Peter Pomeroy, who was on the scene Tuesday morning, nor Halton Hills recreation director Tom Shepard, who was there Monday night, could be reached for comment Tuesday afternoon.

The town issued no press release on the matter, the mayor's office said.
