What are seven young people from across Canada doing up to their ankles in mud at Crawford Lake?

Ten Katimavik participants, will spend a total of three months at the Halton conservation site, as part of a nine-month exploration of self-sufficiency and alternative ways of life.

Katimavik, which means "meeting place" in the Inuit language, also places a strong emphasis on environmental projects in host communities.

Digging in the archeological site for Indian artifacts develops academic skills like cross-sectioning as well as shovelling finesse, says group leader Maryse La Fleur, adding Katimavik objectives like working together and managing aspects of group life are very important to the young Canadian contingent whose ages range from 17 to 21 years.

Two Katimavikers remain at the group's Rockwood house on a rotating basis, giving each participant an opportunity to experience food management, housekeeping and cooking challenges.

"We only have $3.50 a day to spend on food for each person," explains Miss La Fleur noting the importance of using imagination and an understanding of food groups and substitutes for expensive products.

Adapting to situations which differ from familiar home environments is an essential component in the Katimavik program.

Although the group has occupied the relatively comfortable Rockwood accommodation (they spent the first few days in tents at Kelso when they arrived in mid-July), for a few weeks, their adaptive mettle is being tested again as they search for billeting in surrounding communities.

It is the responsibility of each member to secure living accommodations for themselves for the period Sept. 6 to 21.

The object of the three-week stay with a local family is direct experience of local people and how they perceive their own community, region and province.

In exchange for bed and board, the Katimavikers will provide working hands for community projects.

"Life without money forces you to develop a lot of different skills," says Miss La Fleur, adding material rewards are not the prime motivator to participants who receive $1,000 if they remain in the program for the nine-month commitment.

Social life is also a group responsibility, she notes. Activities like rock climbing and hikes take place of movies and other forms of entertainment that cost money. A recent trip to Toronto's Kensington Market was in keeping with two program objectives: learning to shop for food on a budget, and finding ways of entertaining the group on a shoestring.

At the end of their three-month Halton stay, the group will take on challenges at St. Felicien, Lac St. Jean, Que., working with seniors in the predominantly franco-telephone community.
