

Melissa Harrington manufactured acid rain for her project for the Speyside School science fair. Helping her was Judy Eaton.

Ryan Weaver and Steven McDonnell built an infrared scanner for their Speyside School science fair exhibition.

Science teacher Kathy Sanford admires the work of grade 6 student Paula Raine, about why breads get moldy.

Lounie Patenaude, grade 7, based his science project on the taste test.

Rod Laver built a dam for his Speyside School science fair project.

Conduction in metals was the subject chosen by Richard Nipper and Richard Corley for their Speyside School science fair project.

How model rockets work was checked out by grade 8 student Scott Neillis (left) while friend Rob McFarland looks on.

Peter Bray's science project was a genetic experiment involving the cross breeding of fruitflies.

Patrick Johnston, grade 7, used a vacuum to demonstrate the air cushion effect.

Distilled water was the topic of an experiment by Andrea Andres.

One of the most popular science projects was that of Brett Auger, in grade 8 (right). Jane Mathieson checks her reaction time while Terry Near looks on.
