Tories have no way to go but up!

As I write, the race for the Tory leadership is at the tape, after a cross-country course that would have taxed the endurance of a kangaroo.

Its participants have lurched and shambled and jogged across that rugged terrain, through those bogs and quagmires that make up the minds of Tory delegates.

For some, it has been uphill most of the way, owing to a lack of charisma, money, ideas, or all three. Others have taken some dubious short-cuts, hitched a ride when nobody was looking, or floated along on a carpet of hot air.

They'll be a bedraggled lot when they get near the grandstand and try to flog themselves into a final sprint toward that finish line.

The winner, and he has my sympathy, will be handed the magnificent trophy that goes with the job—a Pandora's box.

If he opens it, and he will, politicians being that they are, it will be the Pandora myth all over again. Out will fly all those evil spirits: broken promises, financial disaster, and the cold fury of the losers, who will have him for breakfast as soon as they get their wind back.

But one spirit won't pop out—Hope. That peculiar Hope that seems to belong to the Tories will be too tired to leap out of the box.

So our "lucky" winner will pick it up, hold it tenderly (in both hands), and prepare to do battle against the invidious, insidious hordes of the black-hearted King Pierre, who retire into the swamps and wait patiently, chuckling, licking their lips, each time a new dragonslayer is chosen for them to devour.

On the other hand, maybe, just maybe, the new St. George will be ambidextrous, and with a sword in each hand will be able to fight off his friends as they help him from the rear, and attack and slay the monster in front of him, who has got a bit swollen with pride, and a bit soft from lack of exercise over the years.

Which of these fine, fulminating fellows will be our new champion? If our fairy tale were to follow its course, it would have to be David Crombie. He has the right name, and is the right size, to stand up to Goliath. He might even knock him off, because the giant is getting old and fat and over-confident.

But, even though he wields a mean sling shot, does little David have the killer instinct, the ruthlessness required to get the job? Is he too decent, too human, too caring? Could be.

Let's go on with our fairy story and look at the other hopefuls. Joe might startle the big fellow by shaking his jowls and stabbing his finger at him. He did once before. But the giant quickly realized that behind that mastiff's mien lay all the terror of a spaniel, uttered one roar, and sent him scuttling.

What about Brian? He might try to cow the big guy by jutting a massive chin at him, pointing toward massive reinforcements in Quebec, and hurling some insults in French. But a couple of massive shrugs and some fat subsidies toward Francos would squelch that threat.

There's Jolly Jack the giant-killer from the Island. He might huffa and puff and stick out his not inconsiderable belly at the giant. But unless he made the creature incapable of action by some witty remarks that sent it into paroxysms of laughter, it would have him for lunch.

Last time he tried it, with a perfectly honest 18-cent tax on gas, the critter laughed all the way to the next election, then charged twice as much. That creature can out-tax anybody, any day.

How about the others?
 "Puck" Pockington has the right nickname for a fairy story, but what chance has he, an entrepreneur, against a monster that goes to bed with slick corporations, gobbles up others, and washes them down with oil companies?

It's just possible that Michael Wilson, far too honest and logical to win anything, might put the dragon to sleep long enough for some of its own mini-dragons to devour it. But that's a long shot.

That leaves John Gamble. All he's got is a looping right swing that is telegraphed all the way. The giant, dragon, creature, will merely counter with a few sharp, left jabs, and John is no longer even a bet, let alone a gamble.

Well, I hope I've sorted things out for you, with this melange of myth, analogy and fairy tale.

I really don't care who wins, since the Tories have no way to go but up. Is Joe a loser? Is Mulroney too smooth and untested? Is Crombie too tiny? Is Crosby too far away? Is Wilson too dull, Pockington too business-oriented, Gamble too neanderthal?

I'd be more comfortable with Crombie than any of them, with Crosby as second choice. But nobody ever listens to me. I told them Mackenzie King was a charlatan, Diefenbaker a dope, and Trudeau a cynic, but they wouldn't listen.

Too bad Flora McDonald didn't run. I'll bet she'd poll a huge vote.

See you at the polls.
