Teachers request delay in changes

by Steve Arnold
A series of planned changes to programs in Ontario high schools, slated for next September, should be delayed at least another year according to the union president representing teachers.

Joyce Bradley, president of the local branch of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, said the planned changes leave too many unanswered questions for teachers to be properly implemented now.

Under the planned changes, high school students will be required to take more mandatory subjects and will have a choice of three levels of difficulty in their courses, depending on whether they intend to go to university or not.

Students will also be able to graduate high school in only four years, rather than the current five, if they can meet all the requirements in the shorter time.

For Ms. Bradley, the greatest problem with the changes is the lack of course guidelines and other tools teachers require before they can properly implement the new standards.

She noted teachers are represented on the Halton committee which is planning for the new system here "because we felt we should do what we can in Halton."

Despite that cooperation, however, the provincial teacher organization is pushing for a delay of the new standards.

"Even the guidelines for the new curriculum aren't available yet and we don't know when they will be," she said.
