

Library lights set to shine

The long-awaited new lights for the children's section of the Georgetown Public Library should be installed in the next couple of weeks.

The Halton Hills Library Board hit some snags in its plans to improve the lighting in the downstairs area, which was the subject of complaints by some visitors, but last week were finally able to proceed with the installation.

Chief librarian Betsy Cornwell told board members the lighting is worth $2,650, slightly more than the amount budgeted. She pointed out that the style of lighting fixtures selected could be used throughout the library if it becomes necessary in the future.

The public library used to be in the town hall situated overlooking the downtown on Cross St. It has been gone for a long time but the downtown is alive and thriving.

Nothing like a day at the park when grandma wore a long dress and bowlers were the rage.
