

Education reform: More of the same nonsense

In 30 plus years as an editor, parent, and teacher, I have been inundated (though not quite drowned) by several waves of self-styled "reform" of our educational system, especially that of Ontario.

Each wave has washed away some of the basic values in our system and left behind a heap of detritus, from which teachers and students eventually emerge, gasping for a breath of clean air.

Most of the "massive" reforms in our system are borrowed from the U.S., after 30 or 40 years of testing there have proven them dubious, if not worthless.

We have borrowed from the pragmatist, John Dewey, an American, who had some good ideas, but tried to put them into mass production, an endeavoring but not necessarily noble trait of our cousins below the border.

We have tried the ridiculous, "See, Jane. See Spot run. Spot, see Jane vomit," sort of thing which completely ignores the child's demand for heroes and witches and shining maidens, and things that go bump in the night.

We have tried "teaching the whole child," a process in which the teacher becomes father/mother, uncle/aunt, grandfather/grandma, psychiatrist, buddy, confidant, and football to kick around, while the kid does what he/she damn well pleases. And we wonder about teacher "burn-out."

We have tried a system in which the children choose from a sort of Pandora's box what subjects they would like to take, and giving them a credit for each subject to which they are "exposed," whether or not they have learned anything in it.

That was a bit of a disaster. Kids, like adults, chose the things that were "fun," that were "easy," that didn't have exams, that allowed them to "express their individuality."

New courses were introduced with the rapidity of rabbits breeding. A kid who was confident that he would be a great brain surgeon took everything from basket-weaving to bird-watching because they were fun.

And suddenly, at about the age of 17 he discovered that it was necessary to know some science, mathematics, Latin, history and English to become a brain surgeon (or a novelist, or a playwright, or an engineer, etc.).

There are very few jobs open in basket-weaving and bird-watching or World Religions or another couple of dozen I could name, but won't, for fear of being beaten to death by a tizzy of teachers the day this column appears.

The universities, those sacrosanct institutions, where the truth shall make you free, went along with the Great Deception. They lowered their standards, in a desperate scramble for live bodies. They competed for students with all the grace of merchants in an Armenian bazaar.

Another swing of the pendulum. Parents discovered that their kids knew something about a lot of things, but not much about anything. They got mad.

The universities, a little red in the face, suddenly and virtuously announced that many high school graduates were illiterate, which was a lot of crap. They were the people who decided that a second language was not necessary. They were the people who accepted students with a mark of 50 in English, which means the kid actually failed, but his teacher gave him a credit.

Nobody, in the new system, really failed. If they mastered just less than half the work, got a 48 per cent, they were raised to 50. If they flunked every subject they took, they were transferred to another "level" where they could succeed, and even excel.

The latest of these politically-inspired, slovenly-researched reforms in Ontario is called SERP, and it sounds just like, and is just like NERD.

Reading its contents carefully, one comes to the conclusion that is Serp is accepted, the result will be a great leveller. Out of one side of its mouth it suggests that education be compressed, compressed, by abandoning of Grade 13, and out of the other side, that education be expanded by adding a lot of new things to the curriculum. How can you compress something and expand it at the same time? Only a commission on education could even suggest such a thing.

There will be lots of money for "Special Education" in the new plan. There will be less money for excellence. Special Education is education jargon for teaching stupid kids. Bright kids are looked down upon as an "elite" group, and they should be put in their place.

The universities would enjoy seeing Grade 13 disappear. That would mean they'd have a warm body for four years, at a cost of about $4,000 a year, instead of three.

I am not an old fogey. I am not a reactionary. I believe in change. Anything that does not change becomes static, or dies. Ideas that refuse the change become dessicated.

I am not against spending lots of money to teach stupid kids, or emotionally disturbed kids. But I am squarely against any move toward squelching the brightest and best of our youth, and sending off to university people who are in that extremely vulnerable stage of half-adolescent, half-adult, and turning them into classes of 200 or 300, where they are no more than a cypher on the books of a so-called hall of learning.

And I have the proof right before me, in the form of several brilliant essays by Grade 13 students, better than anything I ever write, who have had a chance to come to terms with themselves and with life, in a small class, with a teacher who knows, likes and encourages them, rather than a remote figure at a podium.
