Molz's gripping vision offers an adventure

by Paul Dorsey
While he shuns comparisons with visionary poet-painter William Blake, Toronto artist Rudy Molz conjures up a few apocalyptic "visions" of his own in his second show at Georgetown's Gallery House Sol.

Molz's drawings, along with drawings of wildflowers and German folk costumes by his wife, Elisabeth Heinen, and designs in glass by April Quan, are on exhibit at the Charles St. gallery until September 27.
Quan's leaded glass window hangings, table top boxes and other constructions are an instantly likeable revision of standard designs, made all the more attractive by her incorporation of a wooden twig or seashells into a complementary setting.

Heinen's figurative drawings, prized among collectors, and depictions of delicate strands of plants, reflect a gentle approach, sometimes using the softest suggestion of color in the folk costumes to evoke the period of the costumes themselves in their artistic presentation.

Nevertheless, neither woman's work comes anywhere close to the artistic level of Molz's intense, gripping drawings, each one a time-consuming adventure for the viewer.

Each represents months, if not years, of work, every area of the drawing an amalgam of symbols executed in pen and ink with layers upon layers of dots, short strokes or lines to produce opposing textures. And if the techniques doesn't enthrall you, the final image will.

Amid his eerie images of serpents, raven-like birds and a toad he describes as symbolizing "prehistoric existentialism," Molz stands firm against comparisons to Blake.

April Quan of Toronto was displaying her delicate leaded glass creations at a summer Harbourfront show when John and Gisèle Sommer of Georgetown's Gallery House Sol invited her to exhibit her work here. Sharing an exhibition with Rudy Molz and Elisabeth Heinen, she launched the show Saturday.

The technique as well as the religious outlook are entirely different, he points out. Still, "Prometheus" Thirteenth Fire" is a sprawling triptych, a format that brings to mind classical religious paintings.
