At Halton Manor Donated time helps

A cure for the summer time blues has been found at Halton Centennial Manor by about 20 teenagers.

Manor volunteers have escaped vacation boredom by spending their days with the elderly residents. The young volunteers, who are generally about 14 years of age, are often stepping into shoes filled by adult volunteers.

"A lot of regular volunteers take the summer off," explained Karen Hutchinson, acting volunteer coordinator.

She hopes to see many of them return this fall but even with the 120 she expects to see in September, there won't be enough.

"I need more people who can commit themselves to one visit a week," she said.

The coordinator doesn't want to feel like she is "taking advantage" of regular volunteers. One method of ensuring this doesn't happen will be a plan to interest those visiting friends and relatives at the home in helping with programs and special events.

Scheduling visits to coincide with Manor activities would make them more accessible to residents who often require help to reach these events.

Transporting residents is one of the many jobs filled by volunteers. According to Ms. Hutchinson most volunteers want to come in every day.
