Making Heat Bearable For Babies and Children

Hot, isn't it? Sticky hot. Swimming pools filled with ice cubes hot. Sleeping inside the refrigerator hot.

While vocal adults can complain, children have a tendency to ignore the heat, until it gets too much for them.

And then they're cranky and whiny, not understanding why they are uncomfortable.

There are sensible ways of protecting your small baby and small children from summer's disagreeable effects.

Eadis Plummer, of the Victorian Order of Nurses, advises mothers to "give plenty of fluids."

Your child could be losing as much water as he's drinking, so don't be afraid of bloating him.

KEEP BABIES OUTSIDE

The baby born in the summer should get out of doors as much as possible, starting when he's about two weeks old.

Expose babies to direct sunlight only before 10 a.m. for short periods, or not at all. Keep them in the shade but exposed to the sky, says Miss Plummer. That is, in the shade of a building or a tree, but not on a veranda, for example.

For toddlers, adequate dress is a must, she says. A sleeveless shirt to prevent a sunburned back and just a diaper, if he's that young, or a pair of pants.

Commercial lotions are great for sunburn although a small baby with a sunburn should see a doctor.

CORNSTARCH HANDY

Cornstarch can be the most useful addition to your kitchen cupboard if you have a heat-sensitive child. Many fair-skinned children are overly sensitive, and develop angry-looking rashes. If the rash is not too bad, a doctor is not necessary, as it should clear up immediately if heat is the cause. "Keep the area dry," says Miss Plummer, and cornstarch is one of the most effective methods.

If the nights are hot and muggy and your children are cranky and unable to sleep because of it pass an ice cube over their lips, or let them suck a small piece of ice.

NOT TOO COLD

A cool bath and a cold drink just before bedtime is also a good idea, says Miss Plummer.

Some medical personnel also feel that air-conditioning can be hazardous, with the abrupt change in temperature. If you own a conditioner do not keep your home too cold. You might find you have a family suffering from summer colds and chills.
