EDITORIAL COMMENT

Should Be Selfish -

With several ibusiness outlets moving from the downtown area in the past decade, merchants should be concerned about the future of what was once Georgetown's only shopping district.

With no intention of crying havoc, the time is long past for those whose business interests lie in the downtown core to form an active organization dedicated to keeping Main Street the prosperous area it has been, and still is.

We do not suggest that there should be the bitterness between shopping districts which existed for a time when Georgetown plaza was first open-

Those whose livelihood depends on commerce must first have a community spirit. The more people shop in Georgetown, the more each progressive business will do in trade. And it can be a healthy situation to have more than one shopping area. Women, particularly, are comparison shoppers and in the old days, they would first look at articles in downtown stores, then go farther afield to another town, before making a final selection. A choice of two or three areas tends to keep business in town, and one or other local merchant benefits in the end.

It is good, then, for all merchants to get together on a sidewalk sale this year, rather than each having their own, as happened in the past. But this does not rule out selfish organizations, banding together to draw more business to one specific area.

The old attitude . . . 'We're doing all right, what's the worry ' is no lonpost office and brewers warehouse moved to other locations. Beaver Lumber pulled out of the downtown area. The liquor store and Canadian Tire are shortly to follow. A large hardware store has closed down, and a theatre.

On the brighter side two blocks of smaller stores have been added, giving a lift to one end of Main Street.

It would be opportune, then, for those downtown to have their own separate group, dedicated to making the downtown bigger and better.

Served Community Well —

There is a personal sadness at the Herald this week, following the death of a valued employee.

tength of service is not uncommon at the Herald, and Les Clark was one of its most senior employees, joining the staff fresh from high school in 1934. With the exception of four war years as an airforce officer overseas, he had been in the Herald's printing department since, mainly as a linotype operator. For several years he contributed a Legion column and lately an occasional column on hospital matters.

Besides his work for the paper, Mr. Clark served his community in many
