We've come a long way with you.

When twenty-five pioneer businessmen met above MacFie's store back in London, Ontario, in 1864, and started the company that is now Canada Trust, it is doubtful they could have predicted the tremendous growth and changes that have since occurred.

Over the years our customers have helped us become one of the foremost members of Canada's financial community, with more branches coast to coast than any other trust company.

This growth and change is most evident when you consider the numerous symbols and signs that have identified us over the years, and how they have evolved. Sometimes they changed because tastes in design changed; sometimes they changed because new printing processes made change possible; sometimes they changed because we had simply grown. Even though one of our names is Huron & Erie and although we merged with Waterloo Trust and Halton & Peel Trust; these names hardly reflect our national character. We are, in spirit as well as in fact, Canada Trust.

Now we are introducing a new symbol and color scheme to better reflect this. You see the symbol in this advertisement, and you will soon be seeing it on the exterior of our branches and on the many different printed forms that are necessary for a large corporation.

We hope you'll remember that it's not so much a break with the past, as it is the continuance of a tradition. A tradition that has seen continual change and adaptation since before Confederation, not only in our signs, but in the way we do a host of other things in order to serve you better.
