

Hot Words and Soul Searching Before Halton Region Decision

There will be a lot of "hot words" and political "soul searching" before the provincial government finally decides on a form of regional government for Halton, according to Claude Bennett, MPP for Ottawa South and minister without portfolio.

Speaking Friday at a press conference at the Ontario Weekly Newspaper Association seminar, Bennett was asked how seriously the province would take Halton's two-tier, three borough regional submission, especially if the county's view conflicted with the Queen's Park design for the region.

Though the minister had said county-prepared studies provide important bases both for provincial regional decisions and for potentially effective local challenges to the eventual government positions, he refused to comment specifically on the political impact of the Halton report.

"I'm familiar with the area you're talking about, and I know the problems," he said. "There'll be a lot of hot words spoken by political bodies before that one is decided."

The "hot words" in Halton have revolved around Burlington's position in regional government for the county.

THREE BOROUGHS
Halton County has accepted a three borough system, with the boroughs comprised of Burlington, Oakville and one North Halton municipality to be created by the amalgamation of the five communities in the northern part of the county.

Despite Halton's firm decision, Hamilton has continued to push strongly for Burlington's inclusion in a Metro Hamilton region.

Burlington politicians have steadfastly maintained that they will not allow the town, or any part of it, to be included with Hamilton.

However, the provincial government has been slow to assure either Burlington or Halton that that will not happen.

ARBITRATOR
Because of the continuing uncertainty surrounding Burlington's future, Bennett was asked whether his reference to "hot words" meant that Hamilton's position would be given more, less or the same consideration as Halton's.

"I'm not prepared to say," he said. "I meant simply that we've already heard expressions from a number of groups, and I will say there's going to be some real soul-searching by the province before it reaches a decision."

He said when there is a dispute about where a municipality should be located within the province's design, the government will act as "arbitrator."

"We will have to make the final decision," he said.
