It's "Sneezin' Season" For Hay Fever Suffers

Ragweed pollen is in the air. It's hay fever season for millions of sneezing people. Pollens that are light enough to be carried by the wind are the chief culprits in most hay fever sufferers. Trees, grasses and weeds all have windborne pollen. However, the overwhelming majority of people with hay fever are sensitive to one special pollen-ragweed-which flourishes in most parts of the country from mid-summer to late fall. But any person may react to more than one pollen. An individual's sneezing season may start in early spring, when tree pollen floats into the air, and stretch until fall when the first frost arrives to kill all the pollens. In fact, someone sensitive to dust or animal dander or other airborne material may suffer all year long.

The symptoms of so-called hay fever are repeated and prolonged sneezing spells accompanied by a stuffy nose and itching eyes. Though the symptoms are annoying and cause discomfort, the disease itself is not dangerous. And once the offending substance is pin-pointed-by skin tests with suspended substances-the doctor can give specific desensitizing injections that can control the allergic reaction.

If hay fever is untreated, the repercussions from repeated attacks year after year can be serious. Chronic sinusitis-inflammation of the sinus cavities-can result. Growths in the nose, nasal polyps, may occur. In addition, about 30 per cent of people with hay fever develop asthma, a widespread narrowing of the smaller breathing passages.
