Leaden Skies And Raw Cold Greet Remembrance Service

Lead-gray skies and a raw November wind, with a touch of snow, marked the 1973 observance of Remembrance Day across Halton Hills.

In communities large and small, veterans and Legion members marched to cenotaphs in morning or afternoon services to pay tribute to the men and women who died in wartime service in Canada's military forces.

This year, for the first time, a Remembrance service was held in Glen Williams, and wreaths were placed at the memorial located there, on the bank of the Credit River.

Traditional Remembrance services were held in Georgetown and Acton, where large groups of participants and spectators braved the chilly weather to attend.

This year, services were held on the eve of departure of yet another Canadian peacekeeping force. Servicemen in Canada were preparing for duty in the Middle East even as bugles played the Last Post and Reveille.

In Georgetown, deputy reeve Ernie Sykes issued a Remembrance call to people to remember the sacrifices of servicemen. Many paid the supreme price, he said, "and we must remember them."

Among the many wreaths laid at the Georgetown cenotaph were those by Terry O'Connor, Halton MP, on behalf of the federal government, and Jim Snow, MPP and minister of government services, on behalf of the province.

Gusty winds knocked some of the wreaths off their wire stands even as they were being deposited at cenotaphs. Except for fighting that is still reported in Indo-China, Remembrance Day 1973 dawned on one of the most peaceful times in the world's history. For Canadians, it was cause to remember more than 100,000 servicemen who died in two world wars and the Korean conflict.
