Need Depot For Clothing

Site for a clothing depot is wanted in Georgetown. A group of volunteer workers, who staged a clothing drive during the summer and who have given away used clothing on two occasions, is looking for space that is central to Halton Hills to give away even more clothing.

A spokesman for the volunteer group said considerable good, used clothing remains in the group's possession. What is sought is a locale where a depot can be maintained on a regular basis until next spring.

The group's two past distribution days were successful, the spokesman said, and clothing collected in Georgetown has been distributed over a wide area. More than 60 local families already have been served. For the first distribution, tickets were distributed through such agencies as the health unit, welfare, children's aid and the like. Ticket holders were able to select clothing to meet their needs.

A second distribution day saw another 25 families served. Some of the remaining clothing already has been given to the Vanier Institute, Catholic Women's League and Ontario Welfare, for distribution as needed. A prodigious amount of clothing was collected. Supplies almost filled a Tilden van supplied by Andrew Murray Motors, and was also gathered in two station wagons and a pickup truck. Only one small bag of clothing had to be discarded as unsuitable for reuse, the group spokesman said.

"We'd like to set up a depot, where, by appointment, we can give this clothing away," said the spokesman. "But we need a place."

The group has approached the municipal council, but said it was told there was no need for the service.

"We think there is a need, and we want to make people aware that this clothing is available," The Herald was told. The group has been approached by the Red Cross for aid.

Anyone who knows of space that may be donated to the group, Clothing Aid, can contact The Herald office. The volunteers of the group issued a special note of thanks to contributors of clothing, and to many other volunteer workers who donated their time. Teenagers who helped were extended special thanks.
