RYDERS TV

What You Should Know About Color TV

Solid State Modular colour T.V. is here to stay, and much advertisement has been composed to show how the cost of maintenance has been reduced by adopting this concept in design. This is good advertising, and we too can attest to the fact that solid state modular T.V. is easier to maintain. The repair of this type of T.V. is most often done by replacing a panel or module in the home. We have been doing this kind of repair now for nearly six years, since its introduction in 1967 by Motorola. (I give the name Quasar). The cost per customer over the years for maintaining these sets has been unbelievably low. In fact from time to time we have asked our customers to bring in any work order showing any cost of any panel (or module) on any Quasar we have sold. We will credit the customer for any money spent for the panel, labour and tax not included, even if the set is six years old. With Christmas coming on we would like to repeat the offer. If any of our customers have spent money on panels, and have not already received the credit in return, bring in proof of purchase of the panel. We have record of the sale of the T.V. and your bill of sale for the T.V. is not required. This offer is good until Christmas, and may be used to buy a small present if you wish.

All solid state colour using the modular concept should be easier to maintain, but where were these other people six years ago?
