"It's a terribly complex film and it is going very well," Mr. Lumet added. Some of his previous films include Taxi-Driver and Dog Day Afternoon.

Mr. Lumet has directed Murder on The Orient Express, Serpico and Dog Day Afternoon.

Shooting is being done by Oswald Morris who recently completed the Seven Per Cent Solution, a Sherlock Holmes film, written by Nicholas Meyer. It opened Friday in Toronto.

Director Sidney Lumet adjusts the Panaflex camera in The Herald offices while cameraman Maurice Arnold looks on.

Sean McCann, policeman, helps retrieve a sign which moments before fell and struck him on the head during filming on Mill Street.

A public relations spokesman for the film Equus said he survived the incident because "actors are made of sturdy stuff."

Mr. Burton and Miss Atkins film a scene in front of the Soup Pot.

Local residents' objections to a plan to place the Welsh actor in the hot sun, as he quickly moved from set to set, were concentrated on his character. A long, slow turn and turning on the street at one point looking down on Sidney Lumet to camera a street scene of traffic travelling back and forth.
