On the beat for Halloween

By LOUIE J. TAYLOR
Herald staff writer

"Hev, you! What are you planning to do with those eggs?" Bill Wilson asked, intercepting a boy on a bicycle as he tried to head out of the store parking lot.

The boy edged away from the car as Mr. Wilson called in to the C.I. base station. He took off on his bicycle, but as he rode through the intersection, he went one way and the eggs went another.

"There's one bunch of eggs that won't be doing any damage," Mr. Wilson said.

Bill Wilson is the president of the Georgetown Emergency Communications Services, a group which patrolled Georgetown and Limehouse on Halloween because of an article published in The Herald last week 1 was invited to ride in one of the patrol cars as they kept an eye on Georgetown.

The club planned the evening for eight weeks, testing the areas set up for each car in patrol, and clearing a channel for broadcast. The job of the club members was to report any suspicious circumstances or instances of Halloween pranks to the police.

The base station, set up in the Georgetown police station was operated by two people. Almost all of the cars had two people. Each unit had its own call letters, and a roll call was taken regularly.

Georgetown was divided up into a number of areas, with Glen Williams and Limehouse also being patrolled. Each area was patrolled with one car, with the cars taking turns patrolling boundary roads.

The club members gathered at the police station at 5:30 p.m. for a last-minute run-through of the rules and regulations. Patrol cars were to drive with their windows up and doors locked at all times. Patrol cars were to have a full tank of gas before going out on patrol. Drivers were to obey traffic laws under all circumstances.

Mr. Wilson said there wouldn't be much action until after the younger children had gone in. The prime areas to watch were schools, plazas and industrial buildings.

The patrols were relatively quiet until shortly after 8 p.m. Then the odd report came over the radio about unusually large groups of youth loitering on corners, near schools or plazas. At this time, too, there were a few calls on the radio from people purporting to be members of the club. These continued, on and off, for some time, as did the problem of cross-channeling, where a conversation on one channel overlaps onto another channel.

Supt. Floyd Schwartz of Halton Regional Police said there were three C.B. groups out patrolling on Halloween Eve, in Georgetown, Acton and Milton.

"The patrols were invaluable to us," he said. "We appreciate their help very much."

Shooting investigated

Police are investigating conflicting reports on how a Terra Cotta man received a gunshot wound to his foot Thursday.

The investigation began when police were called to Georgetown and District Memorial Hospital where the victim was being treated.

The police said the victim, upon being interviewed, told them he had been shooting the gun at the residence of another Terra Cotta man when the weapon fell and discharged into his foot.

However, upon investigating at the scene of the incident, police discovered that there were no scrape marks nor blood on the concrete floor, nor any marks on the weapon to indicate it had fallen on the floor. When interviewed at the police station, the victim changed his story, police said.

The victim said the shooting was going on in the yard of another man who was with some friends. He asked them to stop shooting and was shot in the foot, the victim told police.

CARDS OF THANKS

Freida and Nelson Handy would like to thank friends and especially their children in helping so many ways in the unexpected passing of a dearly loved father and grand father. 44c1

The Georgetown Red Cross Youth would like to thank Flowerworld Mountainview Plaza, for their generous contribution of flowers which were distributed to the Senior Citizens at the Georgetown Hospital during our Halloween visit Oct. 20, 1977. Since this was also the first time we visited the hospital nursing staff for their enthusiastic co-operation in making this visit the overwhelming success it was. 44c
