Timely tips on how to SIN to advantage

Did you hear the one about the guy who took a really cool approach to keeping his stocks and bonds safe?

He wrapped them in a plastic bag and put them into his freezer. Trouble is, the thieves who ransacked his place must have been hungry, for they looted the freezer too.

The victim had no record of his securities, which included Canada Savings Bonds, and it took him months to find out what he'd lost.

Speaking of crime, you might be surprised to hear that police forces across Canada are only too happy if you SIN a little.

You're encouraging people to inscribe the SIN (Social Insurance Number) on all valuable possessions. Then, if a stereo or TV is stolen and recovered, ownership can easily be traced through the Social Insurance Number.

"That's pretty well the same reason we're asking people to provide their Social Insurance Number when they buy Canada Savings Bonds," said a Bank of Canada official.

"Then if you lose any of the bonds or aren't sure which ones you've cashed in, we can easily provide that information."

The Bank of Canada now has more than 20 million records of people who've bought CSBs. Unfortunately, people don't always give exactly the same name and initials when they buy the bonds, and many of them change addresses.

So when you ask for information on your bond holdings, it can be difficult - sometimes even impossible - to supply the details.

"But," you say, "I'd heard the reason they wanted the Social Insurance Number was that without it, 25 per cent of the bond interest would be withheld for income tax."

Not true. The income tax rule has nothing to do with the Social Insurance Number on your CSB application - more on that later.

The only reason the Bank of Canada would like your Social Insurance Number when you buy CSBs is to make record-keeping easier, more efficient and less expensive - all of which should benefit you.

You might not store your bonds in the freezer, but it's surprising how many people do lose track of their bonds.

Do you have a record of every CSB certificate you own, including its type, amount, denomination, serial number and maturity date? Every time you cash in a bond, do you update your record? Is this record in a perfectly safe place?

Even if you replied "yes" to all those questions, what would happen if you suddenly became incapacitated, or died?

Example: John Smith has a heart attack and dies. Fortunately, he has kept a record of his CSBs - but unfortunately, this record doesn't agree with the bond certificates found in his safe-deposit box.

Has he cashed some in without noting that fact? Are other certificates around somewhere else?

To try to get the answers, somebody must write to the Bank of Canada, asking what bond John Smith does own.

"Imagine how many John Smiths own CSBs. Perhaps this John Smith bought some of the bonds as 'J. Smith,' some as 'R. John Smith' and still others as 'R.J. Smith.'"

To make the search even more difficult, Smith has moved several times in the past 10 years, so not even the address is a constant.

"If John Smith provides his Social Insurance Number when he buys the bonds, from this year on, we'll be able to supply a list of those bonds immediately," said a Bank of Canada official.

"The Social Insurance Number is a positive and unique identification. No matter how many John Smiths there are, only one of them has that particular number."

The Bank of Canada is adopting a new, highly computerized system so each person's CSB holdings can be listed under his or her account number.

"But this will work only if each individual has an account number which is unique and is easy to provide when the bonds are bought," said the official.

If you've lost your Social Insurance Number or don't have one, application forms are available from any Unemployment Insurance or Canada Manpower office and most post offices.
