MEMORIALS

Watch for blossom rot

Don't let blossom end rot get to your tomatoes before you do, says Bob Fleming, Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food horticulturist. "It's discouraging to go into the garden to pick a nice ripe tomato only to find the blossom end of the fruit is soft and black." Although the vine may appear perfectly healthy, the fruit will be unattractive and unfit for the table. Blossom end rot is caused by poor moisture conditions in the plant and the soil. You can prevent the disease by watering the plants regularly through the hot summer weather. Mr. Fleming says tomato plants should be watered deeply and thoroughly at least once a week - more during dry spells. Mulching will also help prevent blossom end rot. Black plastic is one popular mulch for home gardens. Lay the plastic on each side of the row of plants, and hold it in place with soil. Other materials, such as leaves, hay and sawdust, also make good mulch for tomatoes. These materials greatly reduce the number of waterings required.

Although the vine may appear perfectly healthy, the fruit will be unattractive and unfit for the table. Blossom end rot is caused by poor moisture conditions in the plant and the soil. You can prevent the disease by watering the plants regularly through the hot summer weather. Mr. Fleming says tomato plants should be watered deeply and thoroughly at least once a week - more during dry spells. Mulching will also help prevent blossom end rot. Black plastic is one popular mulch for home gardens. Lay the plastic on each side of the row of plants, and hold it in place with soil. Other materials, such as leaves, hay and sawdust, also make good mulch for tomatoes. These materials greatly reduce the number of waterings required.
