Sport - fisherman Shangri-la in Yukon

By Tony Sloan
 There's a cozy little fishing lodge on a cobalt blue lake secreted back in the Klunene Mountains in Canada's Yukon Territory. It's called Klunene Wilderness Lodge and if ever there was a scene that is synonymous with the word "sportfisherman's Shangri-la", this is the place.
 Located 265 km (165 miles) northwest of Whitehorse, transportation to the lodge hooks up with the scheduled jet service to the Whitehorse Airport and it's all included in the seven day fishing vacation package.
 We drove west from Whitehorse on the Alaska Highway to the floatplane base at Mile 1118. For private plane owners there is a government maintained gravel strip, 1.6 km long (5200 feet) at Burwash Flats just a few kilometres down the highway from Mile 1118.
 The flight in from Mile 1118 to the lodge is perhaps 15 minutes at the most. As the aircraft roared up off the tiny lake, a cow moose splashed ashore in a panic and disappeared into the trees.

 Incidentally, we logged six separate sightings of moose in the next two days including a cow and calf who appeared each morning within 50 m (55 yards) of the lodge door. One guest jokingly inquired if this particular moose was on staff.
 The Beaver aircraft climbed toward the Nisling Range and then flew low through a hanging valley before descending between sheer-sided mountains to the glassy waters of Tinecup Lake. A neat two-storey lodge of cedar logs with a blue roof nestled back in a forested recess in the lofty cuts.
 If the fishing measures up to the scenery around here, I concluded, Klunene Wilderness Lodge must have the best of both worlds.

After a wholesome repast in the downstairs dining room (guest capacity 24), we moved up to the second floor lounge a well appointed room with a circular fireplace, billiards table and bar.
 An after dinner drink in conjunction with a pre-competition game of snooker prompted several good stories and some excellent lies prior to bedtime.
 Grayling fishing at Moose Lake was the first order of the day next morning. This little lake is just up and round the mountain and a few minutes' cruise over a broad alpine meadow.
 The lake had another name but ever since Hal Lafave counted 26 moose, including calves, along the shoreline a year ago, it has been aptly known as Moose Lake. Only one solitary moose took leave as we dropped in to land.
 Arctic grayling can grow up to almost 2 kg (four pounds) but the average on this lake would be little more than half a kilogram (1 1/2 to 2 pounds). Every cast was a fish hooked.

 After catching a few fish, Dr. Ted Bachelder of Florida and I hung our rods over the side and suspended the lures about 30 cm (one foot) above the water. We then proceeded to photograph acrobatic grayling leaping clear of the water to strike the lures.
 One frisky fish actually managed to hook himself. Irrefutable proof of the unrelenting rapacity of the lure-crazed grayling was provided by George Sinfield of the Yukon Department of Tourism and Information. Claiming to be the all time unsuccessful angler in northern Canada, Sinfield actually boated two fish. George was naturally astounded and all readers who have fished with George will accuse me of being a liar...but it's the truth.

 The afternoon was allocated to trophy fishing in Wellesley Lake.
 It's a 25 minute flight to Wellesley, out through the valley and across the Donjek and Nisling Rivers. The low scrub growth in the high alpine meadows of the Yukon allow large game such as moose to be observed easily from the aircraft.
 Wellesley is 27 km (17 miles) long and is restricted to trophy fishing for lake trout and great northern pike. It means each angler is allowed to keep a fish of each species over 9 kg (20 pounds) and one of each under that weight.
 The fishing had dropped off for the past week as we neared the beginning of August and the low point of the mid-summer doldrums. My personal best for the afternoon was a trout, a shade over 4.5 kg (10 pounds) and a few pike of similar size.

 The fishing season at Klunene Lodge starts June 15 and closes on September 30.
 To make early reservations for the sportfisherman's Shangri-la in Canada's Yukon Territory, write Klunene Wilderness Lodge, Box 4730, Whitehorse, Yukon.
