Parade of Homes

There is no doubt that the preservation of Canada's past as represented by vintage buildings is alive and well and gathering steam with each passing month as appreciation of our heritage grows.

Many such prizes have been turned into museums. Others have been restored, furniture of the period acquired and then opened to the public to vividly depict the life and times of our ancestors.

But like everything else moderation should be of paramount consideration. Museums and other restorations used as government-run attractions don't pay taxes like privately-owned buildings do. Therefore, while it is desirable to preserve good examples of the architecture of yesteryear, it is also desirable to make them pay their way. Other properties have to make up the difference which non-tax-paying properties escape.

The answer is not to stop rescuing and restoring vintage buildings, but to assimilate them as viable, tax-paying showplaces catering to a variety of social, commercial, industrial and residential uses. There is no question that we should be proud of and cherish the prizes of the past, but not to the extent that so many are the responsibility of government that funds cannot be found to keep them in a proper state of repair and they are allowed to fall into decay like some of the architectural treasures of Italy.

If history repeats itself there there is every reason to believe that it would. A government bureaucracy charged with overseeing publicly owned historical buildings would grow as the number of buildings maintained by the public purse grew. Putting the cost of ownership, bureaucracy and preservation together to say nothing of property taxes lost, could add a new burden for already overtaxed Canadians, which they don't need, much less want.

Is it not better then to have most of Canada's heritage buildings, which started out in private hands remain in private hands although not necessarily the same ones - put to useful purposes and paying their way in property taxes?

The Canadian Real Estate Association (CREA) thinks so and supports the preservation of historical and architectural buildings. It also readily concedes there are many buildings of historical or architectural significance which should remain in the public domain. Some of these could be renovated and put to new uses, others could be rejuvenated and restored to their former uses, adding a new flavor, elegance and reminder of Canada's colorful past to the area in which they are located.

There are other aspects of recycling existing structures which should not be overlooked. One is that we are being conditioned to switch from a consumption and throwaway society to a conservation and preservation society to protect our dwindling non renewable resources.
