

Spring start for art complex

Town council has endorsed a contract retaining Keith Wagland and Associates for architectural services related to the new theatre-library-arts complex proposed for construction on the site of the Georgetown public library.

Project construction should begin late next spring to transform the historic Church Street building housing the library into a sprawling, two-story cultural facility. Preliminary designs should be ready by October, detailed drawings by February and approved tenders by March.

In accepting the contract and authorizing the preparation of a corresponding bylaw, council last Tuesday night agreed that Mr. Wagland will be responsible for the facility's acoustics and, where applicable, its preservation as an historic building. The architect will also be required to keep in touch with the provincial ministry of culture and recreation to ensure the availability of financial grants.

NEED TO WORK
The need to work in conjunction with a municipal steering committee has been discussed, and was welcomed by the architect's clerk-administrator Ken Richardson added.

Mr. Wagland's firm was chosen by council over two other architectural companies earlier this summer after all three had outlined general concepts for the cultural complex. The facility will provide more room for the public library as well as a relatively elaborate theatre auditorium and space for arts and crafts exhibits.

Council's decision to endorse Mr. Wagland's contract last week followed a 20-minute closed-door session.
