Vacation Guide

Vacations for the adventure seeker

Holiday adventure is one thing, but to package it economically is the key to the challenge.

According to Bruce Hodge, president of Goway Travel Limited of Toronto, which specializes in off-beat travel opportunities for people in their 20s and 30s, the demand for unusual camping holidays throughout the world has never been greater. And he expects the trend to continue.

The adventurous spirit, which has made Canadians the most travel-conscious people in the world, is still going strong among the new generation of young adults.

When Hodge speaks of "adventure holidays", he means such trips as an overland journey from London to Kathmandu in Nepal, a trans-Africa safari from London to Johannesburg, a rail-ride across Siberia, a South American expedition, and camping/cabin tours in Australia or New Zealand. He has also pioneered Canada and the U.S.A. camping holidays not just to Canadians, but Europeans, Americans, Australians and New Zealanders as well. Vacationers on his Canada/U.S.A. packages enjoy the added pleasures of international companions.

While the most popular of the Goway trips over the years have been the condensed holidays (between two and four weeks) around Europe, there's been increasing interest in the longer journeys to South America and other more distant lands.

Hodge also notes a definite swing from the young student traveller of the early 70s to a slightly older group made up of nurses, secretaries, young professionals and university graduates. So much so that the eligible age limits have been changed to between 18 - 38 years of age on many trips. "This new generation of young adult travellers", Hodge points out, "know that they want a holiday which is basic, relatively frill-free, which permits a good deal of freedom in itinerary, and puts them in touch with the average people of these countries".

Hodge, who is still young enough to appreciate the point of view of Goway's young clients, is an Australian who journeyed to England and got involved in planning camping holidays for British travellers to Europe. He soon realized that there was an untapped market for this type of European holiday in North America, so he came to Canada and started up Goway in January 1970 on a shoestring.

As a result, Goway's business mushroomed in a matter of a few years with groups from Australia and Germany mingling with Canadians and Americans on, say, a Northern Ontario canoe trip, or an African expedition from Marrakesh to Nairobi.

Among young adults there's also an emphasis on value, Hodge points out. That's why food arrangements for instance, on camping trips are covered by a "kitty" charge of approximately $3.00 per day, so that everyone knows how and where the costs are allocated. "Without a doubt" this camping concept has to be one of the most adventurous, yet least expensive ways to see the world".

A super 32 page catalogue called "Young Adult Adventures" gives full details on the different trips available. This can be obtained at your local travel agent or by dropping a line to Goway Travel Limited, 53 Yonge St., Suite #101, Toronto.
