

'Theatre on a shoestring' succeeds through fine acting

with Mrs. Pat in mind for the lead role, despite the heroine's youth and Cockney background, then fondly acknowledge the healing effect Shaw's words have upon a bed-ridden Stella, injured in a car crash.

"Pygmalion" turned out to be the culmination of a lengthy relationship which declined gradually in the years between that play's 1914 debut and Mrs. Campbell's death in 1939. Shaw's masterwork, excerpts of which highlight "Dear Liar", also provide Florence O'Connor with some amazing opportunities to demonstrate her talent as a comedienne. Her timing and characterizations are impeccable as Stella, the 49-year old actress, struggles to portray the teenage Eliza Doolittle.

"Pygmalion", the plot of which Shaw paralleled by pulling the "sow's ear into a silk purse" trick with his favorite actress, was a huge success, and to use the play's line, saw them "both tossed overnight to the very top of the heap".

Much later, there is the fierce argument over Stella's ambition to publish her correspondence with Shaw, with the playwright incensed at having "to play the horse to your Lady Godiva".

"Dear Liar's" final quarter witnesses Stella's decline as an actress, sadly miscast among the Hollywood filmstars. She retires to Europe, O'Connor aging before our eyes, stooped over and wrapped in a shawl. Shaw himself undergoes a similar process, leaning on a cane as he painfully recalls Mrs. Pat's final letter to him. With a minimum of lighting and music to accentuate the action, Bev Nicholas' self-proclaimed "theatre on a shoestring" emerges as a resounding artistic success, much attention having been devoted to each facet of theatrical production, including the 75 seats, raised toward the rear, which, given the quality of this fine presentation and two very fine performances, should all be rightfully filled for each of the seven planned performances.

The Firefighters Ladies Auxiliary held a bake sale at the firehall Saturday. Jessie Hayes, left, said the selection was very good. Marg Dore helps with the selection of the baked goods while Judy Hayes keeps the tables stocked. All proceeds went to the Auxiliary. (Herald photo)
