

Nursery school threatened?

Hornby residents oppose school closing

Town council's decision to sell the Hornby Community Centre, thereby closing the Hornby Co-operative Nursery School, met stiff opposition from concerned parents and school president Karen Harnden at Monday night's special meeting in Acton.

Mrs. Harnden said that the school's popularity and uniqueness are renowned throughout the Halton Hills area, and that many parents drive their children from as far away as Milton and Georgetown so they can attend classes. Mrs. Harnden added that she would present council with letters and a petition attesting to the school's value and urging that council reconsider the proposed sale.

Coun. Russ Miller asked Mrs. Harnden if the community centre's main hall, which is used for the nursery school, could be used for other purposes by other groups. Mrs. Harnden replied that the hall can be readied for public use if the school is notified 48 hours in advance, but that this has happened only "once in four years."

Coun. Pat Patterson suggested that since two thirds of the children attending the nursery school are from Milton, council should approach Milton Mayor Don Gordon "to see what he could do in this connection." Coun. Roy Booth suggested that residents of Hornby should ask themselves what other purposes the community centre might serve.

"Sometimes people don't appreciate a thing until you try to take it away from them," he said.

Violet May of Norval claimed that it is "unthinkable to close the centre and leave the nursery school without a home." Mrs. May said that she realizes there is an "imbalance in maintenance (costs) and money being brought in," she hoped council would explore "alternate means of reducing costs."

Following a suggestion by Mayor Pete Pomeroy, council decided to defer the matter until July 7.

Construction soon on police HQ

Work was scheduled to begin Monday on the new $500,000 Georgetown police building. Halton Regional Police Commission awarded the tender to the firm of Martin-Stewart Contracting Limited at a meeting Thursday. Architect John Harkness said he will be preparing the contract for signing, and he intended to ask the general contractor to be on the job Monday morning.

The commission wants to have the building ready for occupation by December. The original bid submitted by Martin-Stewart, which was the lowest of the four bids submitted, was $547,700. The commission decided to post-pone some of the items originally included in the tender specifications, and to pay for others out of the force's operating budget, in order to bring the cost of the building into line with the capital budget for the year approved by the region.

Len Ariss and Company Ltd., Bradford-Heine Construction Ltd. and William

McNally Construction Ltd. also submitted bids.

One of the innovations in the station will be a video security system in the cells.
