Students, parents annoyed by local restaurant lay-offs

Georgetown's newly opened Wendy's restaurant has recently laid off ten of its 85 employees because of a drop in business following the rush opening, but some parents of students working there aren't happy with the way the situation was handled.

Robert Tunney told The Herald this week his daughter was laid off after buying a uniform for her job, and was told that there would be a delay of two weeks before she would receive her severance pay and a separation slip.

"Those kids are paying up to $70 an outfit for their uniforms, and once they're laid off, they've spent that money for nothing," Mr. Tunney said. "My daughter was hired as a full-time employee and she had to go out and buy the slacks and the blouse and shoes, and now she's been laid off."

Craig Lenton, assistant manager at the restaurant, said that in his view, the purchase of a uniform is a risk an employee takes. He pointed out that in many factories, safety boots are required and the employee must purchase them at his own expense, running the risk of getting laid off.

"I can understand the parents getting upset about the uniform thing, but it's part of a business," Mr. Lenton said.

Mr. Tunney also questioned the need for reason for the delay, in the release of the salary owing those who have been laid off.

Mr. Lenton said the payroll is made up in the company's head office in Montreal, and because the staff is paid bi-monthly, there is a delay in getting the payroll made up and sent back to the store. He added that the reason for the delay with the separation notices is the time it takes for him to receive the complete information necessary to complete the notices from the company's head office.

"When the staff were first hired, they were told we couldn't promise them 'x' hours a week," Mr. Lenton said. "The number of hours they work is determined by the number of customers who come in."

"We told them when they were laid off that if business picked up again and more staff were needed, they would be the first ones hired back. They've been trained, so it would be a waste not to put that training to work."

"I just find the whole thing very frustrating," Mr. Tunney said. "It's really bad those kids get treated like this on their first job."

Carnegie course returns

Bill Evdokimoff, publisher of The Herald, announced this week that the paper will again sponsor the Dale Carnegie Course in Halton Hills.

"This world famous adult training program has been very successful in this area of Halton due to the high number of success-minded individuals residing here," Mr. Evdokimoff commented.

The formation of course will be under the direction of Len Kurt and Bruce Beattie, training consultants with K.D. Crone and Associates whom present Carnegie Training in Ontario.

Thousands of individuals enroll each year to develop the skills for effective management and selling their ideas, as well as handling the challenges that are plaguing our economy today. This action-packed course has improved marriage relationships as well and has enhanced the social life of many whom feel comfortable on the job inadequate in groups.

Many companies, such as General Motors, Inglis, and Westburne Industries, as well as smaller local companies, find this program more result-oriented than others they have used.

While the class is forming, Bruce and Len will be arranging workshops for local companies on topics such as goal setting-attitude control etc. Please call 877-2201 for more information.
