

The McDonalds Restaurant summer nature hunt, which had been running all season through August, proved to be very popular with youngsters in Halton Hills. Rummaging in fields or along roadsides, kids collected an interesting variety of twigs, leaves and mosses, pasting their finds on bristol board. The winners and runners-up are (left to right) Jennifer Hartig (winner, ages 8 to 9); Kathy Moyser (runner-up, ages 10 to 12); Paula Zillo (winner, ages 10 to 12); Tracy Hagget (runner-up, ages 8 to 9); Gregory Downing (runner-up, ages 6 to 7); and Paul Glass, (winner, ages 6 to 7). Contest winners received Ronald McDonald plarm clocks, while Ronald .T-shirts were given to the runner-ups. Contestants wishing to pick up their entries do so by

There may be an investigation of the town's animal control service because of the firm's refusal to test a bat for rabies after it wounded a six-year-old Halton Hills boy.

Jay Burt began a series of 14 anti-rabies inoculations last week after the federal ministry of agriculture's health of animals branch confirmed that the bat was rabid.

It was Mayor Pomeroy who insisted the bat be tested. Jay and his grandfather, Eric Lawrence, found the bat on the ground near his Fourth Line home. Jay received scratches

Saturday morning's heavy raintall didn't do a thing for the newly-laid sidewalk on Guelph Street in front of St. George's Anglican Church in Georgetown. The cement was still "green" when the rain hit, and the result is a sidewalk resembling a rollercoaster ride. Members of the town works crew were out Tuesday morning to tear up the ruined sections.

Macho mudpacks for men

By PAUL DORSEY Herald Editor

When I was still a newspup (i.e., young newshound) in journalism school, my wizened old professor (the man who taught Ernest Hemingway how to spell "Cuba Libra" for his early Toronto Star dispatches) sat me down in the faculty lounge and warned me I'd have to cross many muddy rivers of despair before I could sit down for lunch with Walter Cronkite.

Thus, I accepted as part of The Long, Hard Climb my recent invitation from Herald Beauty Spot columnist Barb Presswood to drop by the salon at Ricci Colffure for a sample treatment - that is, the MEN'S version of the facial-manicure process- which produces Beautiful People on a daily basis right here in River City.

Barb and her two licenced aestheticians take appointments from local men and women (and children, too) who are interested in converting the mundane, as it were, into the vigorously alive.

'Vigorously alive" is the way your skin feels when you walk out of the salon at the Delrex Market; thanks to a series of material treatments, thorough cleansing and a firm massage, your face and hands (and feet, too, it you dare to tread) are positively glistening with the natural oils applied and glowing with refreshed vitality.

Having never been one for extensive self-maintenance (the current Dorsey model carries a handsome pot belly that snuck up on me while I was enjoying a quiet beer one night). I entered The Beauty Spot last Wednesday with an undue amount of doubt and trepidation clouding my usually open ASEXPECTED The salon was as I'd expected: the muzak on the overhead speakers, a hair stylist quietly re-arranging someone's scalp, a customer reading a magazine under a dryer, the various smells of perm rinses and such, the dozens of cosmetic products and posters advertising them.

No male domain this, I thought while Barb greeted me and sent me off to a more private cubicle with her aesthetician, Madeline. The context of my visit, of course, was a scheme to add to this column's popularity through a personal glimpse. We decided that I would provide that glimpse myself and, in so doing, try and help Halton Hills' male population that, if they're "into it", so to speak, there's certainly nothing funny or, shall we say unmanly, about spending an hour or two scrubbing your pores and cutting your cuticles.

Apparently, several local macho types do it every week, lending evidence that there is indeed something to be enjoyed in all this.

To be blatantly sexist (the Georgetown Fall Fair Board would understand). Madeline is quite an attractive young woman whose hands add much to the client's enjoyment with firm, sensuous strokes across the face and hands as she applies first a cleansing solution, then a

The vital sensations felt by every nerve ending in these areas are enhanced by a two-minute steam treatment the vapor is softly directed across the face to open the pores and a small, glass device referred to as a "high frequency", used to disinfect problem areas. Blackheads and pimples are literally zapped out of existence in a less than painless manner.

SMALL CUBBY-HOLE So there I lay on the couch in The Beauty Spot's small cubby-hole, my face aglow with pink (yes, pink) plastic goo that gradually hardens; visions of Alice Kramden drawing Ralph's glares on the old Honeymooners show came to mind; so did visions of my once-proud reputation slithering into mirth-filled disrespect.

S-s-s-s-steam heat!

Then there were the fingertips soaking in a small dish of soapy softening solution right out of Madge's palmolive commercials. The guitar callouses on my left hand began to disappear, but Barb reassured me with the news that folksinger Dan Hill has his own cosmetic solutions to keep him in tune with his career.

After a manicure, I glanced at my toenails, realized my sandled feet had gathered a ridiculous amount of dirt and callous, and begged off the pedicure. I similarly laughed off Barb's joking suggestion that I try out the paraffin wax treatment by which some women remove their leg hair ("It'd look funny on the old tennis court," I smirked, secretly alarmed at the whole idea). Another process i passed up on was electrolysis, which a lot of men employ to burn off a few eyebrow (and I suppose, facial) hairs. I pointed out my own fair-haired, clean-shaven good looks and left Barb the names of a few colleagues whose ancestry is closer to the lower primates.

Okay, here's the bottom line: despite all my reservations, despite the muzak and the spectre of invading Women's sacred ground to behold curlers and cream rinse, despite the plastic face mask and the fingertip dip, despite the absurdly luxurious self-indulgence of wiling away an hour or more on improving one's appearance and skin tone, I have to say I felt GREAT when I walked out of The Beauty Spot that Wednesday afternoon.

Although I perhaps couldn't derive the same good feelings from just looking healthy that many customers of the Beauty Spot and Ricci Coiffure do, I truly felt refreshed and invigorated, my face and hands literally vibrating with what must have been some renewed life force, drawn to the surface using much the same method as that of masseurs and faith healers.

Barb and Madeline may not be faith healers, but if you've got a few hours and a few dollars to spare, they can renew your faith in yourself and your own personal energy. Looking good, feeling good: that's what it's all about. Stay tuned to this column for more on personal appearance, grooming and hygiene.

Parents are angry because the ministry allotted money for a new separate school in Oakville, but no funds were allocated to the building of a school in Acton to replace the present 100-year-old building being leased from the public school board. The board has already purchased a site for the new school.

The Acton and Oakville projects had been given equal priority in terms of need by the board when spending proposals were submitted to the ministry. The school is presently housed in a two-storey stone building, once a house, with five rooms and two portable classrooms. Another portable is scheduled to be added this fall when projected enrollment will reach 210.
