

Still no MOH for Halton region

Plagued by a province-wide shortage of accredited doctors to do the job, Halton still lacks a medical officer of health to head programs within the region's health department.

The post was vacated in November, 1979, following the retirement of Georgetown doctor Joseph Chamberlain and while the region's health and social services committee had narrowed the field of candidates down to five during the summer, the applicants either withdrew or were not acceptable to the committee. The position's salary - $41,000 in 1979 - is lower than the provincial average for the job and this may be a factor in the delay, although committee chairman Walter Mulkevic indicated that the region would be willing to discuss an increase.

Provincial health minister Dennis Timbrell has asked regional personnel director Dennis Camm for an explanation for the hold-up in filling the vacancy.

Doctor Gordon Inglis, a Burlington general practitioner, has been Halton's acting medical officer during the search.

Farming's future: seminar

The final phase of a three-pronged attack on problems facing Halton's rural community, a half-day forum examining "A Strategy for the Future of Farming" will take place in Milton this Saturday morning. All interested citizens are welcome to attend the 8:30 to 1 p.m. forum at Halton Centennial Manor, for which a light lunch will be provided. The Halton Agricultural Advisory Committee and the Halton Community Pulse Group from the University of Guelph's Rural Development Outreach Project have arranged the forum to complement their inventory of area farming, the slide show prepared to highlight strengths and concerns and a farm tour recently conducted for politicians and rural residents. For more information, contact Marilyn Burwood of Halton region's planning department at 878-8113, extension 237.
