

The Wood Furnace for Central Heating

By: A. St. Germain

Heating the entire house is possible with a furnace and suitably arranged ducts.

Heating with a wood stove can cut oil, gas or electricity fuel bills 30% or more. By using a wood fired furnace, wood becomes the main source of heat unless the home owner is away. The saving in fuel bills can be as high as 80% or more.

The modern CSA or ULC approved wood furnace is safe, efficient and reliable and if the power is cut off can be operated without electric controls, unlike an oil, gas or electric furnace.

This system is very similar to any other central heating system that is installed in the basement. Controlled by a wall thermostat and using a cold air return and warm air supply ducts and registers, a wood furnace will supply a comfortable and even heat distribution.

Even heat is provided by the thermostatic control which automatically opens and closes the air access to the combustion chamber. Actually this principle is the main reason why the burning of just a few logs can be maintained for periods of up to twelve hours.

In many cases, due to the size of the combustion chamber, it is not necessary to split the logs. Remember however that someone has to carry these logs and feed them into the furnace, so they should not be too heavy to carry. As far as ashes are concerned these need only be removed from furnace once a week to every two weeks. (A cord of wood will only produce a bushel of ashes).

Another very popular method of heating centrally is with a combination wood/oil furnace like the Hunter combination. These units are equipped with two electric wall thermostats, one controls the wood section and the other the oil section. If the consumer leaves his residence for several days and is unable to refill the wood portion of the furnace, the oil section of the furnace will automatically take over.

Here are a few tips on heating with a wood furnace. If for some reason or another you are not using a blower with your furnace but using it strictly as a gravity unit, raise the furnace off the floor and set it on cement blocks. Cut out the bottom panel of the furnace base and this will provide a better air flow.

When buying a wood furnace see your heating contractor. You need a licensed installer.
