Tree power presents an alternative to oil

If you can't drill for oil, grow it.

It all started when the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources began planting fields of hybrid poplars to use as fast-growing pulpwood which could be harvested like an agricultural crop.

But research showed these same poplars could be turned into methanol or wood pellets or some other form of renewable energy. It's almost like an oil farm, an oil plantation.

The poplars will grow in areas of the province not used for agriculture now — especially in poor and wet soil. Within two years they grow to 10 feet, large enough to use as an energy crop. And after they are harvested, new trees grow out of the old stumps.

By 1995, plantations of the fast-growing hybrid poplars in Ontario could be producing the equivalent of six million barrels of crude oil — enough to heat more than 300,000 homes for a year.

Ontario Energy Minister Robert Welch points out that producing synthetic fuels from biomass — including hybrid poplars or wood waste — is a major part of his ministry's five-year, $75-million alternative transportation fuel program.

By 1995, about 15 million barrels of oil equivalent (BOE), or two per cent of Ontario's total energy requirement, will come from:

- forest (mill) residue — 0.9 million BOE or enough to heat more than 50,000 homes a year;
- forest (bush) residue — 8.4 million BOE or enough to heat more than 420,000 homes a year;
- biomass energy plantations — 5.9 million BOE or enough to heat more than 300,000 homes a year.

Turning wood waste into energy solves two problems — waste management and energy production. Northern mills which have had to pay to get rid of wood waste now are using it to produce the energy they need — or even selling it to local industries.

For instance: The Shell Canada Woodex plant at Hearst is using wood waste to produce 100,000 tons of wood pellets a year to fuel the Abitibi Paper Co. Ltd. pulp and paper mill at Troquois Falls.

With help from the Ministry of Energy, the Levesque Plywood Ltd. mill at Hearst is using a new wood gasification technology which will convert 30,000 tons of wood waste a year into energy.

ENERGYSCOPE

The Monteith Correctional Institute near Timmins is evaluating the potential of heating its gymnasium, and eventually the entire facility, by burning wood. Other institutions are watching this work closely.

The Ministry of Energy is also working with the Canadian Wood Energy Institute to provide background information for a new publication on home heating with wood.

And the first phase of a four-part wood energy study recently showed that Eastern Ontario alone could provide more than a million dry tons of wood and wood waste each year to turn into energy.

Going back to wood heat is a return to an old, but reliable, energy source. Since Ontario has lots of wood, it only makes sense to improve techniques which will allow many industries and homeowners to replace expensive imported crude oil with more secure supplies of homegrown wood.

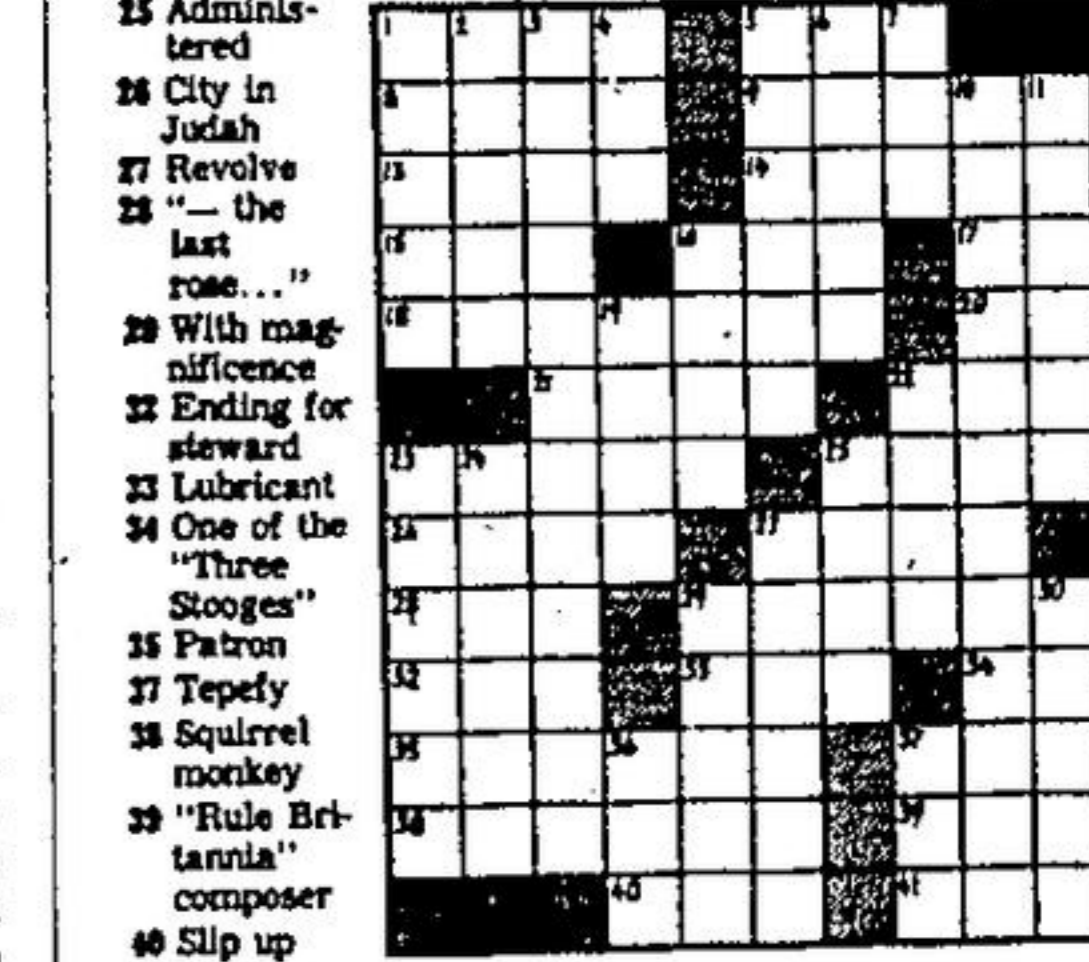

For more information, write to EnergyScope, care of the Ministry of Energy, CMS Box 37, Queen's Park, Toronto M7A 2B7.

ENERGYSCOPE is prepared by the Ontario Ministry of Energy as part of Energy Ontario
