Sound barriers

At least for the time being, Halton region will do without a "sound barrier" policy where busy roads cut through residential and commercial areas. Regional councillors last Wednesday declined to spend their $52,000 share of a proposed $104,000 sound buffer along Steeles Avenue between the Milton courthouse and Thompson Road. Oakville Mayor Harry Barrett, recalling previous staff reports which put Halton's road condition status among the lowest in the province, suggested that the money would be better spent improving roads. Some councillors suggested that sound barriers should be erected by developers building houses near busy routes (more than 40,000 cars per day) or the region should foot the bill in areas where traffic has increased in previously developed, quieter areas.

Media on a leash?

Regional industries which are dumping more heavy metal wastes than they are legally allowed will be given three chances to "clean up their act" before their names are released to the public. However, planning and public works chairman Bill Johnson told regional council and a television news crew last Wednesday that offending industries are being given too much of a break by the recommendation passed in council. Coun. Johnson said the public and the media should be given "more credit" for being able to handle news that the companies are exceeding the limits and argued that offenders' names should be disclosed as early as possible. Other councillors expressed fears that if the companies aren't allowed to correct the pollution problems quietly, they might eventually move, forcing Halton residents out of work.
